Peak winter waterfowl migration is evident along the Delaware River Valley at Bombay Hook National Wildlife Refuge in November. It protects one of the largest tidal salt marshes on the Mid-Atlantic coast.

Bombay Hook has over 13,000 acres of tidal salt marsh with a 12 mile auto tour through the fluctuating impoundments. Spotting scopes can help see numerous waterfowl and shorebirds along the waterways. Sightings may include species such as Canada geese, snow geese, (blue and white phases), gadwall, mallard, black duck, pintail, American widgeon, wood duck, northern shoveler, blue-winged and green-winged teal, scaup, bufflehead, ruddy duck, red-breasted and hooded merganser.

What to expect: Weather and Sightings

The birds migrate through this area
because of the weather and geography.
They follow the coast and they feed on areas which have unfrozen open waters.
This is a large area for waterfowl to overwinter.

Bring along a pair of binoculars, rain gear and water resistant shoes/boots. Insect repellant and a hat/brim would be beneficial depending on temperatures.
This is a great opportunity for experienced and novice birders as well as avid outdoors folks to experience vast numbers of birds!
